Background for DREAM

Entrepreneurship research is a relatively young discipline that has until recently been focused on the recognition and discovery of opportunities. As it grows up and engages in a more serious conversation with the history of ideas, an additional exciting agenda might consist in researching entrepreneurship not only as finding but also as ‘making’ new opportunities, firms, markets and institutions.

The DREAM Philosophy

DREAM is designed for both researchers and educators who care about the rigorous intellectual aspects of studying and teaching entrepreneurship. Research for DREAMers spans everything from publications in top-tier journals to developing your own research agenda at every level of what you do, be it teaching or writing for practitioners and policymakers, for the purpose of deepening your own intellectual understanding of what you do.

The DREAM Agenda

Through DREAM we will think through and map the possibilities for an agenda for entrepreneurship research that relaxes the assumption that most key variables in our models are exogenous to the decision process; that outcomes are largely determined through pre-existing stable relationships between those variables; and that we are caught in a strict dichotomous choice between micro and macro levels of analysis. Note that DREAM will touch upon teaching effectuation as well as learning to understand important intellectual concepts related to it.
